

NEW SUBWAY LINK.

First Train at Noon Today from East 42d St. to Queensboro Plaza.

The first train to be operated over the Queensboro subway from the Grand Central Station, in Manhattan, to the Queensboro Plaza, in Long Island City, will leave the Queensboro subway station in East Forty-second Street at 12 o'clock today.

The trip from the Grand Central station, in Manhattan, to the Plaza station, in Long Island City, will consume not more than fifteen minutes after that spur of the Dual Rapid Transit System is in thorough working order.

It had been expected that that division of the Queensboro subway, because of the non-delivery of materials, would not be placed in operation until after Nov. 15, at the earliest date.

At present the only route to the Queensboro Plaza from Manhattan is by way of Queensboro Bridge. With the new line in operation and transfers from the Manhattan subway system issued at the Grand Central station, Queensboro Plaza will be quite as accessible from the midtown sections of Manhattan as is Fourteenth or Seventy-second Street at Broadway.

The Union station in Queensboro Plaza is the point of connection and transfer between the Queensboro subway, the Corona-Flushing and Astoria lines in Queens and in Manhattan with the Second Avenue elevated railroad and the Fifty-ninth Street and Broadway subway to Brooklyn, now in course of construction.

The New York Times

Published: November 5, 1916

Copyright © The New York Times